IMMORTALITY

As many-colored pebbles from the shore
Tossed in a sun-lit hour upon a lake,
So do we fall; letting a ripple break
To leave the placid waters as before.
A moment's flash, a cry, and then no
more,

We sink into the silence of the years
That swiftly swallow all our hopes and fears.

This is our tale, ancient when Tyre was young,

When Baalbek flaunted glory to the Sun.
But yet, in high-flown, death-defying
hours,

When Memory links the Ages one to one,
Out of the matrix of Time's mystery
Something of Beauty in that flash abides Though life itself be sunk beneath the tides!

ness, Arthur Goldsmith; Stage and Properties, Jerome Frankel and Archie Elliott; Dance (to follow the play), Ethel Wiener and Howard Bernon.

The Church Peace Union, in a "Manifesto Against War," signed by Catholics, Protestants and Jews, declared that: "The time has come when organized religion must proclaim that never again shall war be waged under the sanction of the Church." The message also urged that the United States join the World Court and the League of Nations, and concluded by declaring: "It is not enough to renounce war; we must also cease to prepare for it."

ALBERT EINSTEIN SAYS

"I thank you for the evidence of sympathy and fraternal feeling which this cordial reception manifests. If we as Jews can learn anything from these politically sad times, it is the fact that destiny has bound us together, a fact which in times of quiet and security we often so easily and gladly forget. We are accustomed to lay too much emphasis on the differences that divide the Jews of different lands and different religious views. And we forget often that it is the concern of every Jew, when anywhere the Jew is hated and treated unjustly, when politicians with flexible consciences set into motion against us the old prejudices, originally religious, in order to concoct political schemes at our expense. It concerns every one of us because such diseases and psychotic disturbances of the folk-soul are not stopped by oceans and national borders, but act precisely like economic crises and epidemics.

"The most important lesson which we can learn from these tragic occurrences is, according to my view, the following: we must not conceive of the Jewish community as one purely of religious tradition; but we must so build it up that it still shall give to each individual composing it a spiritual purpose, protection against isolation, opportunities for educating the youth, and, in times of individual need or external pressure, also the needed material protection.

"In this fashion we shall regain that spiritual balance and modesty which frequently we have lost in the isolation of the assimilation process. Self-respect, together with a modest reserve toward the outside world, instead of an inner isolation and characterlessness, in conjunction with external ambition and lust for power, must be our motto. In order to achieve such a convalescence, we must give the individual, by the aid of the community, a definite spiritual purpose.

If prudently and with enthusiasm we can learn to find this way, without falling into our earlier error of spiritual isolation from the outer world, not only will our children be made more secure and happier, but they will prove more useful for the larger human community than our present Jewish generation."
